CLOSING THE GAP

Background

Historically, the Closing the Gap strategy is a long-term, Coalition of Australian Governments (COAG) framework that builds on the foundation of respect and unity provided by the 2008 National Apology to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Peoples.

In 2008, COAG agreed to six ambitious targets to address the disadvantage faced by Indigenous Australians in life expectancy, child mortality, education and employment.

In December 2018, COAG committed to forming a genuine formal partnership with Indigenous Australians to finalise the Closing the Gap Refresh and provide a forum for engagement throughout the implementation of the new agenda.¹

COAG also released a draft Closing the Gap framework, including draft targets that consist of new and existing targets – now including justice targets.² However, the Change the Record coalition consider that these justice targets are not adequate enough to address the issue.³

In February 2019, the Closing the Gap Report was released and presented to Parliament. This was the final report of the 2008 framework. The report indicated that only two of the Closing the Gap targets are on track to be met after 11 years.⁴

The Closing the Gap Report 2020 noted that, in partnership with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, the Government is moving towards a new National Agreement on Closing the Gap setting out priorities for the next ten years. It was again reported that, though some progress is being made, only two of the Closing the Gap targets are on track to be met.⁵

Policy position

Law Council Australia

The Law Council of Australia has formulated a policy position with respect to these issues and has been advocating for, among other things, giving Indigenous Australians a meaningful voice in respect to the laws and policies that affect them through a constitutionally enshrined Voice to Parliament.⁶

Law Society of Western Australia

In February 2016 the Law Society of Western Australia resolved to commence a strategic campaign known as ‘Closing the Gap’ with an emphasis on the spiraling rates of incarceration of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in Western Australia.

The Law Society has, for example, advocated for the repeal or amendment of laws which provide for a penalty of imprisonment for offences arising from a fine default and supported the initiatives of the garnishing of Centrelink benefits and salaries by employers and companies as alternative solutions. In June 2020, the Law Society welcomed the passing of the Fines, Penalties and Infringement Notices Enforcement Amendment Bill 2019 (WA), which will see imprisonment for non-payment of fines restricted so it can only be ordered by a Magistrate, and even then only as a sanction of last resort. The amendments also include the introduction of garnishee orders.⁷

Currently the Law Society’s campaign is being advanced by the work of the Indigenous Legal Issues Committee, the Aboriginal Incarceration and Justice Reinvestment Working Group and the Law Society’s Reconciliation Action Plan (RAP) Working Group.

Policy Position

The Law Society of Western Australia reaffirms its policy position of February 2016 and seeks the support of all parties to:

- consider the new draft targets, including justice targets, under the Closing the Gap Framework, to ensure the targets work towards reducing rates of Indigenous imprisonment and violent offending;
- establish a national agency to collect and evaluate comprehensive data on corrections, law enforcement, juvenile justice and diversionary measures, to inform government policies around crime and imprisonment; and
- abolish mandatory sentencing laws.
